CORE SURVEY..... 176

Methodology & Sample Size

Each quarter, GWI fields its full Core survey in 43 markets. In addition, it runs a shorter mobile version of the same survey in 47 markets (including Ghana, Kenya, Morocco and Nigeria).

The minimum sample sizes for both surveys are outlined in the table.

Some questions within the full survey are only asked to a representative subset of respondents. These questions are included in what is referred to as the 'Brand & Media' module.

Throughout this document, questions included in the Mobile survey are indicated with an asterisk (*), whilst the questions included within Brand & Media are indicated by two asterisks ().

Socio Economic Segmentation

SOCIO-ECONOMIC SEGMENTATION

To allow a way to compare socioeconomics across countries, GlobalWebIndex has a system whereby respondents receive points based on their answers to a number of questions relating to their lifestyles, professional lives and personal circumstances.

Once these points have been allocated to all respondents in a country, that market is divided into five quintiles – with the 1st quintile containing those of the highest social grade and the 5th quintile comprising those at the other end of the spectrum. The global segmentation then aggregates the quintiles from each country; so, the 1st quintile at a global level comprises those respondents who are in the 1st quintile within each market. This ensures that no market will be unfairly impacted by a behavior which could be important globally but which might have less relevance locally (such as car ownership in places like Hong Kong and Singapore).

As a result of this approach, the nature of respondents in the 1st quintile is likely to vary between countries, depending on each market's economic prosperity and level of development. In short, 1st quintile respondents in a market like the US are likely to be more affluent than those in fast-growth markets. However, this was a deliberate decision on GWI's part, as otherwise the top quintiles globally would be dominated by mature markets across North America, Western Europe and parts of APAC such as Japan.

For similar reasons, points relating to someone's wealth levels are awarded relative to their position within their own market. Put another way, we allocated income-related points based on whether someone is in the Top 25%, Mid 50% or Lower 25% of their own country in terms of declared income. That means a Top 25% person in the US could earn far more than their Top 25% counterparts in fast-growth markets.

For questions relating to income or wealth where we offer a "prefer not to say" option, those who selected it were awarded a neutral score designed not to up- or down-weight their overall ranking. Only a small minority of respondents select this option, however, and analysis suggests that they come from a range of financial backgrounds.

There are a total of 115 points available for each respondent, and they were allocated as follows:

Income One score, max 17 pts	High	17	Car Ownership One score, max 15 pts	0 cars in household	1	Device Ownership One score, max 10 pts	7+ Devices owned	10
