

CTO / Co-Founder HECTOR OSORIO

Hector Osorio is a serial entrepreneur who grew up in New York city as a first generation Colombian with a passion for technology. As a teenager he learned visual basic and he found his passion was in the code. After his first job out of college at Oracle, he left to co-found his first startup, Niku. It was an early cloud-based SaaS platform, in 1998 that went public in 2000 on NASDAQ and was later acquired by CA, Inc. Since then he has been an early employee and technical lead at various other startups, including Flixster, the social movie site and mobile application. Flixster was acquired by Warner Brothers in 2011 and after completing his vesting cycle he moved on to pursue a new vision with James Norman. Currently Hector serves as the CTO and co-founder of Pilotly, where he combines his passions for technology and entertainment to develop the data layer of visual media.

Hector earned his BSE in Computer Science from Harvard University and is also a proud member of the Screen Actor's Guild. Along with James, he was accepted into Batch 16 of 500 Startups for his work with Pilotly.