

Graham Hudson, Special Adviser to Assessment Professionals Internationally

Graham has been a member of the international assessment community for over 35 years. He has worked in General Qualifications in the UK and been a part of the educational reforms during this period. He ran the marking of National Tests for England and undertook government-funded research into the implementation of technology in assessments. He went on to develop, with colleagues, one of the electronic marking systems now used both in the UK and globally.

He thrives on helping professional organisations, government ministries and development programmes get better outcomes from their examinations and assessments. Delivering measurable improvements, working to immovable deadlines and supporting strategic change come with his years of practical experience.

He provides specialist skills and knowledge that combine successful implementation of large-scale systems with a practical understanding of the pressures that examination and assessment bodies face daily. He specialises in helping organisations find the right systems for their needs, drawing upon experience of procurement and tendering at varying scales.
